

Office Productivity: A Work in Progress

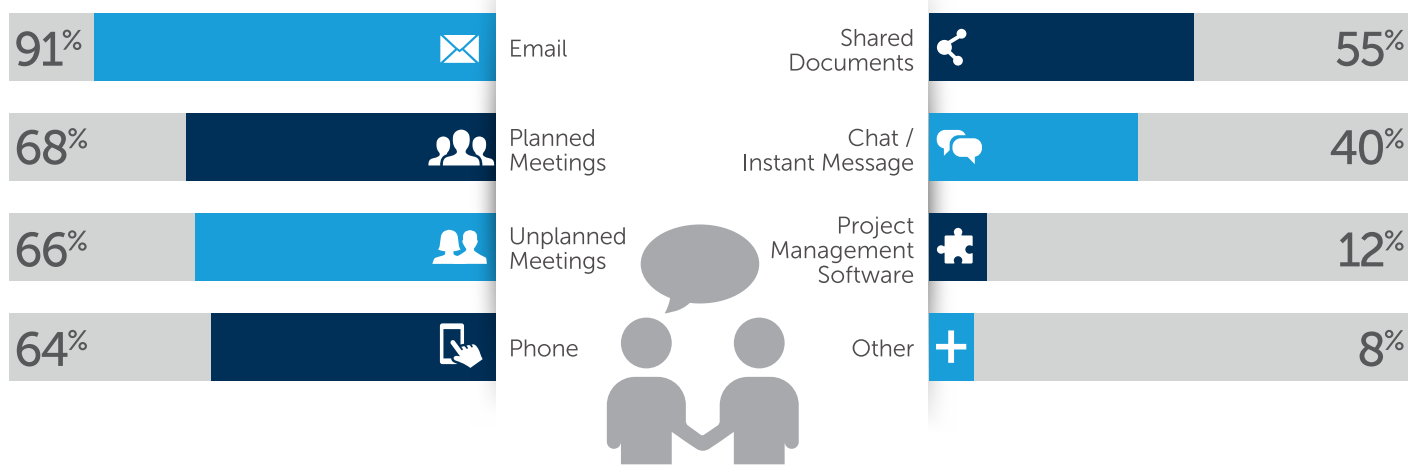

An annual study of office workers shows the struggle for productivity is very real. Here are some insights into their unseen struggles.

How do office workers spend their time?

The average office worker spends more than half of their time on activities outside of their primary job duties.

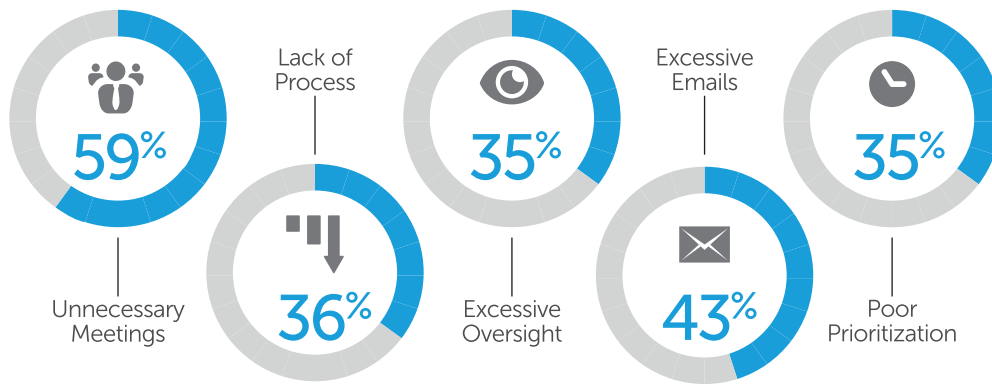

How do office workers communicate?

Despite numerous options, many workers are slow to adopt newer communication methods—preferring to stick with familiar choices like email.

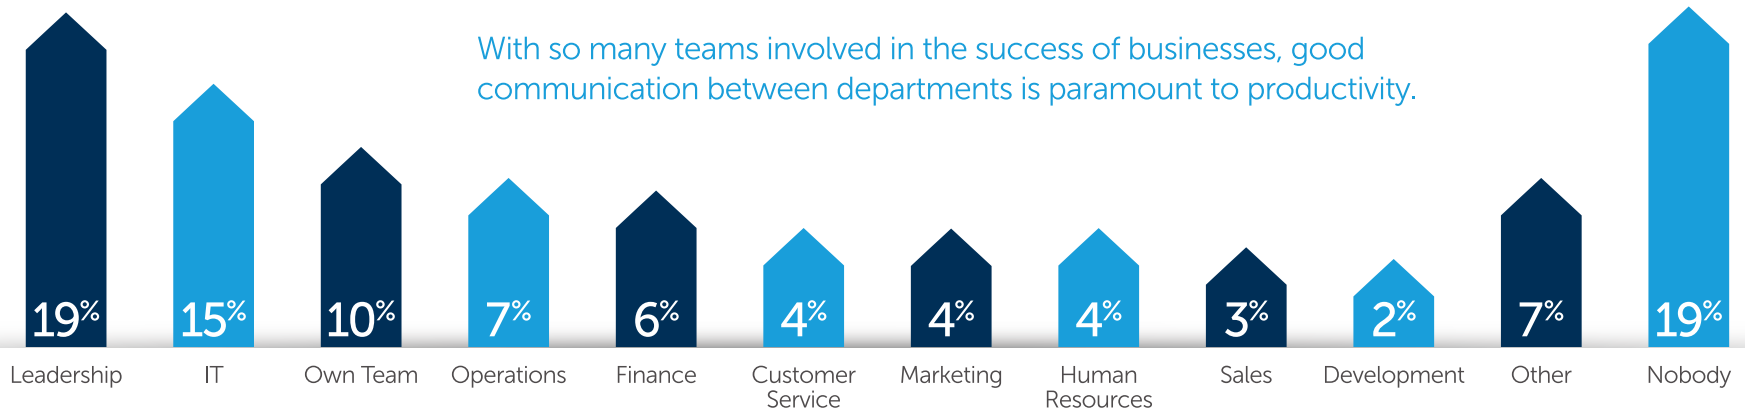

Sometimes the very tools and activities designed to boost productivity actually become barriers to it. Choose carefully and implement purposefully.

What gets in the way of work?

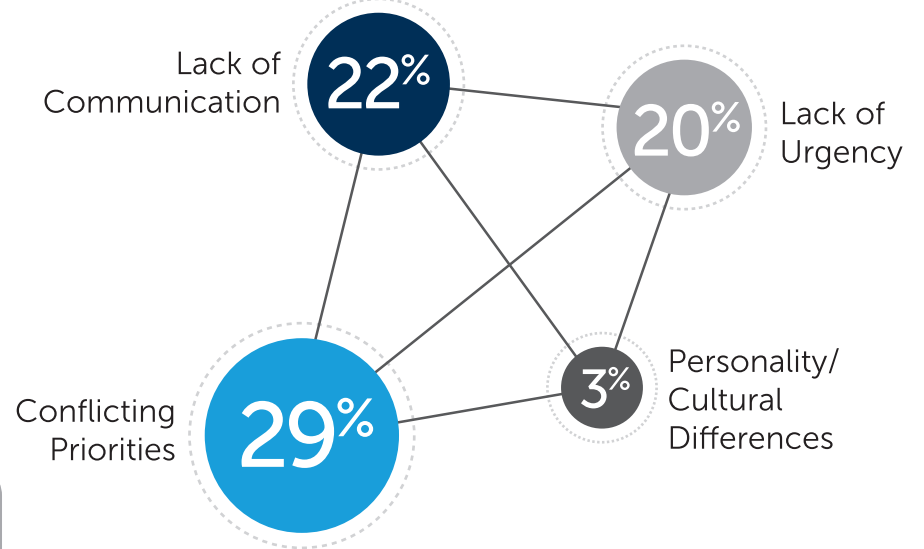

Who are workers butting heads with most?

With so many teams involved in the success of businesses, good communication between departments is paramount to productivity.

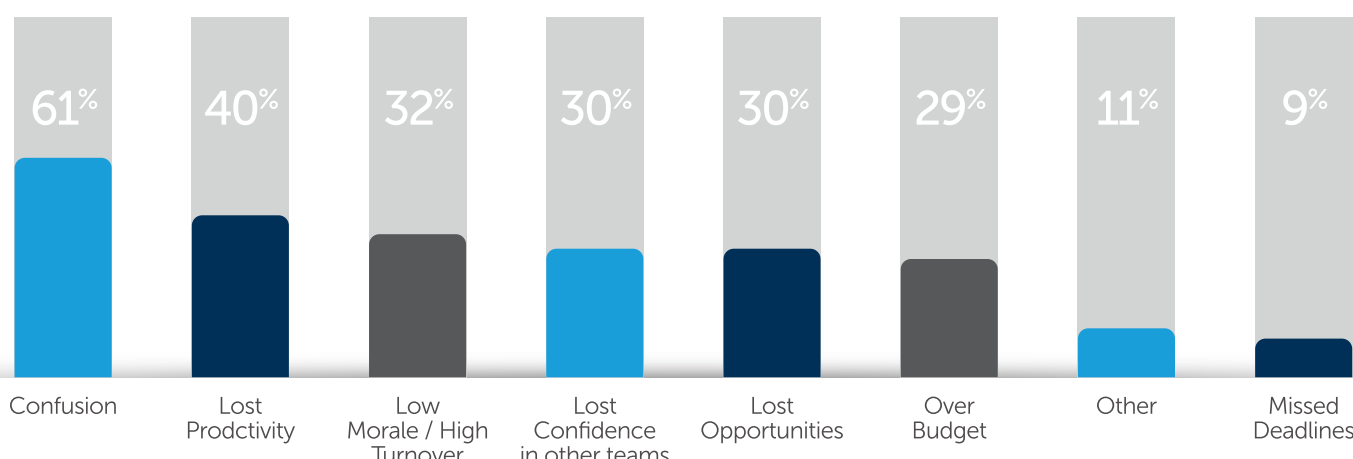

Why do workers have conflict with other groups?

Address communication problems and you're solving one of the leading sources of conflict and lost productivity.
